

Dear colleagues, friends!

Our life is wonderful and unpredictable. It has place for joy and sorrow, rise and fall, white and black streaks... Although it would be nice to have mostly white streaks and we could move along them, not across. However, even in this matter there are different points of view. For example, yogi consciously give up happiness and joy so they won't feel disappointment and suffering and have a homogenous life. Yet, we think this is no life at all! That's not the way we are! Firstly, a life without adrenaline rush has long been unpalatable to us. Indeed, "what Russian is there who doesn't love fast driving?" Secondly, oil prices and currency rates may go up and down, but pediatricians still have work to do. That is our life and an insurance of harmony: if children ail, they need help, and nothing else matters much...
